

The Barson St. Bridge

The San Lorenzo Improvement Club is up and doing, its major work now being the opening of Barson St. from the east side of the San Lorenzo river to Pacific Av., and the erection of a wagon bridge and walk over said river on such street, and they are going to work intelligently by calling to their aid the efficient services of John B. Leonard of San Francisco, the architect of the beautiful and strong bridge that spans the Pajaro river at Watsonville, Mr. Leonard now being at work on the plans and specifications of a long and costly bridge that is to be thrown over the Sacramento river.

The "Sentinel" hopes later to run a cut of the proposed Barson St. bridge, and at the same time to submit reliable and close figures of cost.

There is yet to be something doing "in the old town," the mission town of Santa Cruz, a mission town that the Fathers located way back in 1791, but not so far back as not to have its many virtues and great advantages seen by the pilgrims who wandered into this almost undiscovered region from Mexico. But the city of Santa Cruz is not half what she ought to be, not in 1920 what she should have been in 1900, and the taxpayers owning property located between Soquel Av. and the base of Beach Hill feel that they have been given a "cold deal" whenever any public loaves and fishes have been distributed.

There, Mabel!
