SC Council Urged To Copy Hearings Now Used By State Parks Department

The acrimony and polarity created by the city's rent control issue might be avoided through the "workshop" method the state uses to resolve controversial park issues, the Santa Cruz City Council was told Tuesday by Ed Porter of the Lighthouse Field Association.

Porter, who came close to being elected to the City Council in November, told the council during the oral communications period at the evening session:

"The workshop method is a wonderful process where people with different ideas sit down together to work out problems. People have strong ideas and there are all kinds of problems, but through the process the state gets some concrete, solid proposals.

"If you had a workshop on rents, instead of polarity you could get some dialogue. What are the problems of the landlords? They have them. What are the problems of the tenants? They have them.

"I think through a workshop on rents you might get some good proposals."

The council took no action, consistent with its policy of not acting on proposals from the floor at the same meeting at which they are made.
